Since then I have knotted my arms about the bust of centaurs, and the bodies of heroes, and the trunks of oaks; my hands have gained experience of rocks, of waters, of the innumerable plants, and of subtlest impressions from the air; for I lift them up, on blind calm nights, in order that they may take knowledge of any passing breaths and draw from thence signs of augury to determine my path. —The Centaur, Maurice de Guérin (transl. G.B. Ives)

LIKE A FOREST OR A GARDEN OR A FIELD, an honest page of letters can absorb—and will repay—as much attention as it is given. Much type now, however, is composed not for the page but for the screen of a computer. That screen can be alive with flowing color, but the best computer monitors have dismal resolution (about 130 dpi: one fifth of the current norm for laser printers and roughly 5% of the norm for professional digital typesetting.) When the text is crudely rendered, the eye goes looking for distraction, which the screen is all too able to provide.

The screen mimics the sky, not the earth. It bombards the eye with light instead of waiting to repay the gift of vision. It is not simultaneously restful and lively, like a field full of flowers, or the face of a thinking human being, or a well-made typographic page. And we read the screen the way we read the sky: in quick sweeps, guessing at the weather from the changing shapes of clouds, or like astronomers, in magnified small bits, examining details. We look to it for clues and revelations more than wisdom. This makes it an attractive place for advertizing and dogmatizing, but not so good a place for thoughtful text.

The screen, in other words, is a reading environment even more fugitive than the newspaper. Intricate, long sentences full of unfamiliar words stand little chance. At text size, subtle and delicate letterforms stand little chance as well. Superscripts and subscripts, footnotes, endnotes, sidenotes disappear. In the harsh light and coarse resolution of the screen, such literate accessories are difficult to see; what is worse, they dispel the essential illusion of speed. So the links and jumps of hypertext replace them. All the subtexts then can be the same size, and readers are at liberty to skip from text to text like children switching channels on TV. When reading takes this form, both sentences and letterforms retreat to blunt simplicity. Forms bred on newsprint and signage are most likely to survive. Good text faces for the screen are therefore as a rule faces with low contrast, a large torso, open counters, sturdy terminals, and slab serifs or no serifs at all.

ARISTARCHUS ON THE SIZES AND DISTANCES OF THE SUN AND MOON (HYPOTHESES)

1. That the moon receives light from the sun.
2. That the earth has a relation of both point and centre to the orbit of the moon.
3. That when the moon appears to us split in half, the great circle separating the shadowed and bright [parts] of the moon inclines to our sight.
4. That when the moon appears to us split in half, then it is away from the sun by a quadrant less one-thirtieth of a quadrant.
5. That the width of the [earth's] shadow is that of two moons.
6. That the moon subtends a fifteenth part of a sign of the zodiac.

It is therefore concluded that the distance of the sun from the earth is greater than eighteen times, but less than twenty times, the distance of the moon, according to the hypothesis concerning the dividing in half; that the diameter of the sun has the same relationship to the diameter of the moon; and that the diameter of the sun has a relationship to the diameter of the earth greater than that of 19 to 3, but less than that of 43 to 6, according to the relationship which was found concerning the distances, the hypothesis concerning the shadow, and that of the moon subtending a fifteenth part of a sign of the zodiac.

—Aristarchus of Samos, c. 280–240 BC
